Emily Weber Discusses the Factors That Shape Parenting Plans in Custody Cases

NOVEMBER 3, 2026

When parents separate or divorce, developing a parenting plan can be one of the most challenging aspects of the process. The plan must establish where children will live and how major decisions affecting their well-being will be made. While a child's best interests remain the primary consideration in custody decisions, factors such as age, developmental needs, parental responsibilities and the ability to co-parent can all influence the outcome.

Emily Weber recently spoke with Super Lawyers about the factors that shape custody decisions and how attorneys help parents develop parenting plans that reflect their family's needs.

> Emily discussed the growing emphasis on flexible, individualized arrangements, noting, "There's a lot more focus now on being creative with parenting plans so they work for each family." She also explained how attorneys help parents navigate custody disputes and identify practical solutions, including the use of a parenting coordinator, to move the process forward even in high-conflict situations.
